Afghanistan: When Marines Met a Djinn in a Classroom

In southern Afghanistan, American soldiers say a classroom "came alive" around them. Questioned the next day, a local mullah spoke not of a ghost but of a djinn. An investigation into a region where two imaginations of the invisible collided.

A School, a Wall, a Night

As is often the case, the story begins with a rumor. A group of Marines assigned to guard a school near Amir Aghah learn from residents that teachers were allegedly murdered there during Taliban rule. Nothing known about the region makes the claim implausible: southeastern Afghanistan has endured four decades of war, reprisals and massacres.

One night, the troops spot movement near the perimeter wall. They secure the area and clear the compound. It is in a classroom, they say, that everything tips over: a desk falls and moves across the floor. A window shatters. No obvious cause is found.

"It Is Not a Ghost"

The next day, the Marines question a local mullah. His answer is not the one Westerners expect. He speaks neither of the restless souls of dead teachers nor of revenants: he speaks of a djinn.

In Islamic tradition, djinn are beings from an invisible realm that theology calls al-ghaib, "the unseen." They share our universe without being perceived, and can intervene in human lives for good or ill. An apparition is therefore not the soul of the dead here, but a presence of another nature.

According to the Marines, the activity did not stop with this explanation. Furniture kept moving. Apparitions were reported. Several service members said they had the same dream: being chased by a dark figure.

Everyone interprets the unexplained with the words their culture puts at their disposal.

Amir Agha, Land Both Sacred and Cursed

To understand the mullah's reaction, one must know the place. The locality of Amir Agha, in Garmsir district (Helmand province), takes its name from a protective saint. A small shrine there is dedicated to Amir Hamza, presented by local tradition as an uncle of the Prophet and one of his most faithful commanders, as well as to one of his descendants, Amir Agha. His tomb is said to lie beneath the building.

For residents, this place protects. A mullah's son from Garmsir told journalists that Soviet armored vehicles sent against the shrine got stuck in the mud, and that in 1982 a rocket fired at the roof allegedly vanished before reaching the tomb, then exited through a window. The rusting wrecks still lie across the region.

The shrine's caretaker gives a darker reading of the American presence: according to him, soldiers came several times at night, forced villagers to stay indoors and took precious marble tablets inscribed with Quranic verses. A desecration, he says, that set a curse in motion. It should be stressed that this is his account, not an established fact.

OP Rock: The Hill of Bones

The same area produced the most famous military paranormal story of the war in Afghanistan: that of Observation Post Rock, known as "OP Rock," a few hundred meters from Patrol Base Hassan Abad. It is a mound of roughly one hundred feet, riddled with collapsed tunnels and likely developed by the Taliban.

When Marines and British soldiers dug their positions there, they unearthed bones in large quantities. Residents explain that the hill has served as a burial ground for centuries and was also the scene of massacres during the Soviet-Afghan war of the 1980s.

The testimonies that followed have become a classic of the genre: lights resembling muzzle flashes without any gunfire, radio static, sudden temperature changes, serial nightmares, sleep paralysis, the feeling of being watched. One Marine reports hearing, in his ear, a whisper in Russian meaning roughly "drop your weapon." Even the dog the soldiers had adopted, named "Ugly Betty," barked at figures no one could see.

The affair was relayed by The New York Times (an article by Thomas Gibbons-Neff, published in late October 2020) and adapted in the American series Paranormal Witness (season 4, episode "Beneath the Rock"). One Marine saw the place as a "conduit" for paranormal activity.

One caveat is in order: the Amir Aghah school account and OP Rock are two distinct episodes, even though they occur in the same area. Lacking a date, a unit or an official report, we have been unable to corroborate the desk incident with an independent document. For now, it rests on the testimony of the service members.

Summary File — Reconstruction (Sourced Facts Only)

File: phenomena reported by Western service members, Amir Agha area (Garmsir, Helmand)
Document status: editorial summary, not an official document
Reported elements (Amir Aghah school): nighttime movement near the wall; overturned desk; broken window; moved furniture; apparitions; recurring dreams of a dark figure.
Local interpretation: a mullah suggests a djinn.
Documented elements (OP Rock): bones discovered during earthworks; lights, radio static, temperature variations, nightmares; coverage by The New York Times in 2020.
Unestablished elements: cause of the broken window and moved furniture; reality of the murders of teachers at the school; effect of any "curse" of the shrine.

Two Grammars of the Invisible

This is where these stories become inseparable from place. An American soldier arrives with his own cultural baggage:

the ghost, the haunted house, the dead who return, fed by cinema and barracks legends. An Afghan community has another vocabulary: protective saints, sacred places, spirits, djinn. A troubling event is then read by both sides, each in its own language.

The encounter is sometimes explosive. In Amir Agha's case, the same place is seen as a haunted graveyard by the Marines, as a protective shrine by the villagers and as outraged ground by its caretaker. As Atlas Obscura sums it up, one culture's vengeful spirit is another's guardian angel.

The Critical View: Stress, Priming, Suggestion

Skeptics have serious arguments. First, the conditions: isolation, fatigue, lack of sleep, constant tension, buildings gutted by years of fighting. A desk that tips over or a window that shatters in a weakened structure can have mundane causes (wind, settling, an animal, even a human presence), especially as the troops had just spotted movement near the wall.

Then there are the dreams of being chased by a shadow. They recall sleep paralysis, studied notably by folklorist David Hufford in The Terror That Comes in the Night (1982), which shows that the experience of a menacing presence in the bedroom appears in many cultures, with local dressing. Sleeping in groups and recounting one's nights is enough to spread the same motif.

Finally, psychiatrist Anthony Feinstein (University of Toronto), a specialist in the psychological effects of conflict, explains regarding OP Rock that hallucinations are not in themselves a symptom of post-traumatic stress, but that traumatized people can dissociate and experience abnormal perceptions. Above all, he describes a mechanism of priming: a few soldiers have a strange experience and recount it, and those who follow arrive expecting something to happen. Cut off from the rest of the world, with no outside "reality check," they reinforce the belief. He compares the phenomenon to the expectations surrounding places of miracles such as Lourdes. He stresses, however, that he cannot make any diagnosis without examining a patient.

This also applies to the mullah's explanation. Once the word "djinn" is spoken, it becomes a frame for interpreting what follows: a moving piece of furniture, a dream, a shadow. The explanation may have shaped the experience as much as the reverse.

What Can, and Cannot, Be Asserted

What happened in that classroom? We do not know. The Marines are sincere, but sincerity is not proof. The mullah applies a respectable reading, consistent with his tradition, but it cannot be verified. And the psychology of combat, while it offers solid leads, does not explain every detail of an account for which we lack the full file.

One lesson remains: in wartime, men from two worlds shared the same place and each searched for words for a common unease. Perhaps they were all confronted with something none of them understood, and simply drew on the cultural vocabulary available to them. In this region of the "graveyard of empires," the boundary between history, memory and the supernatural remains extremely thin.
