

Golden UFOs filmed by the International Space Station

On February 1, 2022, several golden UFOs were filmed by the cameras of the International Space Station. What is it?

Scott C. Waring, ufologist, explains:

“I was watching the live cam when suddenly some glowing golden objects began to move past. The objects appear metallic since they are gold and have a slight brown, green hue to them. Some are small but others are as big as the space station. At first I thought them to be clouds...but never in my life have I seen such clouds. Then maybe space junk...satellite debris, rocket debris in orbit? But I have never seen such technology in use ever! Perhaps its urine and waste being dumped by the ISS astronauts? Well, you see, NASA spent tens of millions of US dollars developing a machine they placed on the space station that recycles all bodily waste, so that it can create fresh drinking water for the astronauts. I'm not sure if the Russians see it this way, but NASA astronauts have no choice. Still, these things on camera do not look like waste. But sometimes they seem to phase in and out of visual...as if they are inter-dimensional ships in earths orbit. It does seem likely that future humans could be looking back in time studying us in their own habitat to better understand their past.”
