

A human-like face found on Mercury

The field of ufology continues to fascinate and intrigue, with the latest claims from ufologist Scott C. Waring adding fuel to the ongoing debate about extraterrestrial intelligence. On June 26, 2011, Waring announced that he had discovered a human-like face on the planet Mercury while examining photos taken by space probes. This controversial discovery raises numerous questions about what might be hidden within our solar system.

Waring, well-known in the ufology community for his search for unusual structures and shapes on celestial bodies, often interprets these findings as evidence of extraterrestrial activity. According to him, the face found on Mercury displays distinct human features: a nose, eyes, cheeks, forehead, and mouth, resembling a man around 35 years old. He also speculates that extraterrestrials might age differently from humans, complicating any precise age determination.

What makes this discovery even more intriguing is Waring's claim that NASA has since deleted the original photograph from its official website. He describes this action as "fraud" and accuses the agency of attempting to hide the truth from the public. Nevertheless, Waring managed to save screenshots of the image, which he shared on his website to remind NASA that concealing information is a serious offense.
